“ Lillian and I met as house officers at Children’s Hospital in Oakland California. She was then as always during her whole career, amazingly skilled and dedicated to the babies not only in her care but dedicated to improving neonatal care for all preemies and newborns.

She was a pioneer in the field of neonatology, before neonatal intensive care units were established and had a great deal of input regarding all aspects of her field over the years.

While we were both still in training as young doctors, my husband had to go to Vietnam during the war and Lillian moved in to our apartment for a year. We remained friends for all these years albeit physically distanced on opposite sides of the country.

She left behind a huge legacy that likely only those in her field of medicine will fully appreciate. It is fair to say that because she lived and worked, countless babies past and present owe their lives and health to her in some very specific ways.

Personally we shared good times and some sad ones. I was widowed at age 33 and she mourned with me. She married somewhat late and sadly was also widowed prematurely when her husband died in a car accident. She thought of his children as her own all the years and spoke lovingly of each of them and their children whenever we met. I was privileged to have known Lillian and shared early days together.
